Note

zonas de baja señal (poema sin cobertura) [low-signal zones (poem without coverage)] is a performative and multilingual piece born from exhaustion, digital saturation, and personal disconnection. Through its visual and sonic structure, it explores the inability to contemplate, to read, to be moved by art, while life narrows into an endless loop of screens, solitude, and scrolling.

The poem is the result of a text distillation process. It originates from written outbursts —texts created in moments of reflection. These writings speak of personal experiences marked by isolation, the difficulty of connecting with peers, the creative block, and the longing to return to art without fear. This raw material was later transformed into an experimental and fragmented poetic language, preserving the vulnerability at its core.

2The text integrates multiple languages —Chinese, Thai, English, Polish, and Norwegian— each accompanied by romanizations or pronunciation guides. This multilingual layering is not ornamental: it reflects a deep longing to connect across borders, to touch and be touched by other voices, even in states of isolation.

Designed for live performance with real-time electronics, the piece can be interpreted in multiple ways depending on the linguistic background of the performer. The performer is invited to navigate fragmented paths, absurd repetitions, broken voices, and internal rhythms of language as sound.

This is also a self-portrait from fatigue: the poem gives up, slips, laughs, glitches, and powers down. It offers no answers —but it opens a space to remain in the question:

how to contemplate when survival already takes everything?
